

During the last Ice Age sea level was 120m lower than at present, and there was no bay. A large river draining the interior of California flowed through the bay basin on its way to the ocean about 40km west of the present shoreline. Secondary streams drained the broad valleys now partially flooded by San Francisco Bay.